Can't Wait to See You: Events

I'm headed to the Association of Personal Photo Organizers annual conference, where I'll once again be presenting a class, this time called, Business Have Disorganized Photos, Too!

Science Project

If you really want to learn how to organize your life, offer to help an elementary school child with their science project. Both kids took on a science project this year, and all the steps needed to get from idea to presentation were a true exercise in organized thinking!

Taking on a huge project like this, especially when there is no guidance or structure given to you, will definitely test all of your organizing skills:

- time management
- information and research organization

- online search skills
- process documentation
- display details and order
- time management

Did I mention time management? We started more than 3 weeks before the science fair! My girls tried to bail on the project several times, but once they learned that they could include sock puppets and taste tests, they were on board.

So, folks, if you can pull together anything on the order of a 4th grade science fair project, give yourself a gold star for organizing, even if the sock drawer is a mess.
